South Carolina Confederate flag heads to museum after crowd cheers its removal

(LA Times) The Confederate flag — and the legacy of the Civil War — has long been a contentious issue in the state, the first to secede from the union. To this day, its Capitol building bears brass bolts in the form of Confederate stars in its granite walls to mark the damage inflicted by Gen. William Tecumseh Sherman's cannon fire during the Civil War. Yet after the June 17 massacre of nine black churchgoers, including state Sen. Clementa Pinckney, at Emanuel African Methodist Episcopal Church in Charleston, the momentum to take down the flag could not be stopped. Dylann Roof, 21, who has been charged with nine counts of murder in the shooting, had been photographed with the flag and other Confederate symbols, and police said he espoused racist ideologies. Most of those gathered outside the Capitol building viewed the Confederate flag as an emblem of a time when African Americans were chained, whipped and traded as chattel. The Confederate flag has flown on South Carolina's statehouse grounds since 1961, when it was put atop the Capitol dome to celebrate the 100th anniversary of the Civil War. In 1962, legislators voted for the banner to remain up in a gesture of defiance against the civil rights movement. In 2000, after years of protest from civil rights leaders, the flag was removed from the dome and a smaller one was placed next to a Civil War memorial on the front lawn. Almost everyone erupted in cheers when Republican Gov. Nikki Haley, one of the first officials to call for the flag to be taken down in the wake of the Emanuel shootings, walked out onto the front steps. A voice from behind the metal barricades yelled, "Take it down," and the chant spread. Seven Highway Patrol honor guards marched in formation across the Capitol lawn. When a white trooper turned the handle affixed to the 30-foot flagpole, the crowd roared. The Confederate cloth was lowered.

WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA AND CENTRAL COASTAL AREAS:

Eureka Weather:

Showers and thunderstorms will continue across the northwest California interior through the weekend due to a few disturbances. Activity will subside on Monday as high pressure begins to build back over the eastern Pacific.

Medford Weather:

A series of weak upper level disturbances will continue to support isolated to scattered shower and thunderstorm activity through Monday. A more typical summer pattern will set up Monday night into Tuesday as a thermal trough strengthens near the coast

Reno Weather:

Drier southwest flow aloft this weekend will bring decreasing thunderstorm coverage and slowly warming temperatures. Dry weather is expected next week with temperatures warming to around average by Tuesday or Wednesday.

San Francisco Weather:

An upper level trough over the west coast will keep temperatures below normal across inland areas through early next week. A gradual warming trend...along with dry weather conditions can then be expected for the latter half of the upcoming week.

WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

CENTRAL CALIFORNIA AND SOUTHERN SAN JOAQUIN VALLEY:

Sacramento Weather:

Unseasonably cool temperatures continue through the weekend with drier weather though a few northern mountain showers or thunderstorms are possible through Sunday. Dry and gradually warmer conditions will arrive next week.

Hanford Weather:

Low pressure will linger for one more day keeping the threat of afternoon thunderstorms in the Sierra. A dry southwest flow will then prevail bringing a warming trend and dry conditions.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA:

Los Angeles Weather:

A warming trend will continue through much of next week as onshore flow weakens beneath an upper-level high pressure system expanding westward. Persistent night through morning low clouds and fog are expected along the coast, extending locally into the valleys.

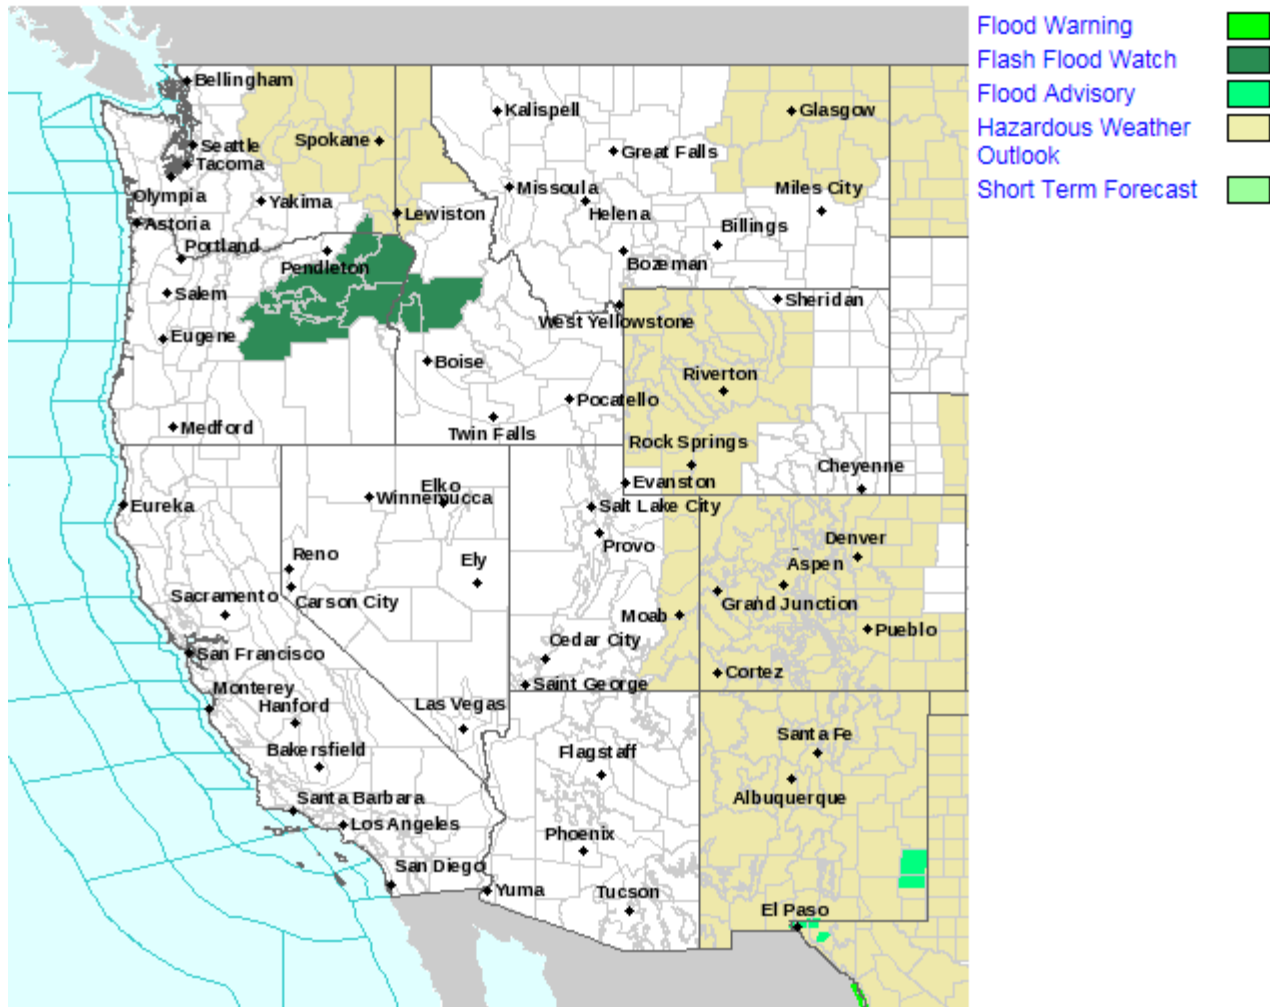

Extreme Southwestern California including Orange, San Diego, Western Riverside and Southwestern San Bernardino Counties:

The trough of low pressure near the California coast will slowly weaken through Sunday allowing for slow inland warming and a gradually shallower marine layer with night and morning coastal low clouds and fog not extending as far inland. Minor day to day changes are then expected for much of next week. For late in the week into next weekend, high pressure to the east may expand slightly westward bringing slow inland warming and a shallower marine layer.

Southeast California Weather:

Little change in the weather pattern is forecast the next several days. Dry weather with near normal temperatures are expected in southeast California.
